Critical Health Literacy

FI Gesundheits-und Sportverein

Why Do We Want To Carry Out Our Project?

The core purpose of this project is to strengthen the ability of youth workers across Europe to respond effectively to the increasingly complex health information environment faced by young people today. The project seeks to evolve youth work practice toward empowering young people with strong critical thinking, media literacy, and resilience, enabling them to critically evaluate and responsibly share health-related information in a highly digitalized context. As online platforms have become the main source of health information for young people significant challenges are being confronted. These challenges are intensified by the rapid spread of health misinformation and the growing influence of commercially driven “wellness” narratives. In response, the project aims to generate a meaningful shift in youth work practice by equipping youth workers with the knowledge, skills, and approaches needed to foster informed, critical, and health-aware engagement among young people.

The project aims to enable youth workers to confidently understand the dynamics of the “infodemic,” identify common forms and tactics of health misinformation including trends, myths, and influencer-driven content and recognize the psychological and commercial forces behind them. This will allow youth workers to move beyond general cautionary messages and facilitate informed, context-aware discussions rooted in a deep understanding of today’s digital landscape.

The project seeks to equip youth workers with a practical set of skills and tools they can transfer to young people, such as evaluating the reliability of online sources, unpacking persuasive media techniques, and recognizing biased or unsupported health claims. In doing so, youth workers will shift from acting primarily as information transmitters to becoming facilitators of critical thinking and inquiry.
